"..I'm usually not a fan of earpieces that rely on the size of your outer ear to stay in place, but these Gramo Ones turned out to be pretty comfortable in everyday use. As for sound, once you get the placement right, the 16mm drivers deliver great, accurate bass and a balanced sound...", - Gary Krakow, tech editor

"...Right away there was a healthy amount of bass greeting my ear, and I don't mean the flabby wubwub kind. Slightly boosted but clean, and strong down to about 60Hz before I noticed any significant rolloff. There was still decent response down to 40Hz...The open back gives the bass and good distortion performance. Covering it with your fingertips immediately drops the bass and cranks your distortion up...", - Armaegis

One only has to go through my profile to notice that I've gone through a lot of Nuforce gear over the years. I high-end stuff, but I've owned or tried most of their budget and midrange setups. Since Nuforce has been bought recently though, their future remains unclear. On the other hand, Jason Lim (co-founder and former CEO of NuForce) started up two new companies: NuPrime which will carry on the high end home theatre toys, and Celsus Sound which appears to be focusing on the portable world.

So that brings us to the Gramo One, the new earbud by Celsus that is the subject of this review. Now if you're thinking "an earbud? really?" and I don't blame you. Headphones have come a long way in terms of public awareness...
